In order to centrally control remote devices, such as television receivers, video cameras and the like, from a central location such as a room, control signals are transmitted from the central control unit to the remote devices. To provide central control of a particular remote device, a large number of control lines have heretofore been required. For example, if video cameras are centrally controlled with a camera controller, which has a video camera control signal output terminal, a large number of control lines have heretofore been required. Conventionally, in the event of a power failure, control signals for remote control devices do not function. In order to overcome the above drawback, it is proposed to utilize a power supply of other than the AC power supply. However, even if a remote control circuit includes a power supply for a control circuit which receives a control signal from another unit, it is still impossible to control the remote device by applying power to the remote control circuit if the power supply is operated at the time of a power failure. In a system utilizing a large number of control lines, a control circuit is installed in each remote device, as well as a control circuit in a central control unit. However, since the number of control circuits are large, such a conventional system requires a number of control lines as well as a large circuit scale.

In a conventional remote control system, if an electric power circuit is used for a control circuit of a remote device, the remote device which is not selected is not powered or is only intermitt
